Many things he noticed on this fruitful evening; but one particularly—the huge bulk of the men. He was of medium weight and size, but among these celebrities he felt like a dwarf. He measured their height as he passed them, and he judged ax feet to be the average; many were tailer still. And then the girths, the broad, deep chests; full cheeks, warm and glowing under frosty beards; strong, coarse features, blust round chins, hig necks, bold, resonant voices, pushing ways—they crowded to the salad just as they had crowded to congress. It was a magnificent collection of physical manhood. What stomach power they had: Terrapin, salad, jellies, creams, champagne and composjellies, creams, champagne and composite punches, fruit, cake—and at 11 o'clock at night! Windward had seen nothing like it since sophomore year, and yet these men had been living thus defiant-ly, gluttonously, for ten, twenty, forty years, and nevertheless now at 50 or 80 years of age were hale, alert and strong enough to kill him with a blow.

rude vigor of body and mind that was admirable; they had stamina; they could administic; they had stamina; they could state out a deadlock or stump a scattered, half cavilized state; they were able to maintain their rights. The polyglot group of diplomatists who were present that much better manners, and yet Windward preferred the horse play and robbst good fellowship of the natives. "Of the two juries," he mused, "I'd rather have the American to decide, for instance, or the claim. Elegance is very well, but after all, if I must decide between them, give me the land of wheat

The colonel moved about through the motley crowd, calm, civil and pideg-matic as ever, and even more laconic than asual. Now and then he would draw a life group around him to hear a pithy story or a very brief Treament of some current topic. Windward noticed that he are sparingly and drank nothing though the corks were popping all about him and the atmosphere was burdened with the fumes of punch. His only cancession to the conviviality of the hour was the incessant smoking of the host's fine cigars.

"These diplomatists," he explained to the chare of the dressing room and passed out into the pure, cold air. ['Always leave balls and orgies early, if for nothing else as an advertisement that you make a good home and some work to do the next day," remarked the sardonic colonel, as they walked briskly onward. "Besides, inothing is mastier than the less of a feast, and especially a men's party. What ronsense such parties are."

"Without ladies, you mean?" asked Windward.
Yes, he said, rather savagely, puffing at his long eight. "The idea of ignoring woman in society! You are unmarried. I believe."
Yes, sir," replied Windward.
Why? asked the colonel bluntly.
Why, I scarcely know," answered Windward, not more than half pleased Celibary is negative murder," said Cehisacy is negative murder," said the colonel sternly. There may be palliating circumstances in your case. They were by this time nearing the colorel's residence, and Wingward noticed that the light in the library was burning brightly. Possibly McArdie saw it also but if so he said nothing of it.

windward took the package, thanked the coloud for his thoughtfulness and kindness, and bidding his friends an early good morning set out for his lodgings. The night was dark and the streets were silent, but he did not walk alone. At his side there still seemed to be a strong man battling with conquering valor against habits worse than death; and before him rose the image of a noble woman, a companion of the soul, a helpmeet, a guardian, a patron saint. Yes, meet, a guardian, a patron saint. Yes, that night laughing eyes and curls had the go-by:

> CHAPTER THI. A MEMBER OF THE LOBBY.

"Claru was in soday," said Louise, What was Windward's welight to find the next morning, on turning over the cose papers which the colonel had tied into a parcel and labeled "Fr. Cl.," a memorandum, fa his sharp, black chirography, of the nature and history of the raphy, of the nature and history of the claims! He had evicently scratched it off in a leisure moment after the young man had left, as a grade and help in the revision of the brief. It was hasty in treatment, but so orisp, vigorous and jucticious that Windward threw his rejected manuscript adds any admired the Windward soon grew to be mach in-terested in his labors. The congressmen were friendly, and life in the lobby was fascinating. He spent some time there daily and became an item in its whirl, jostled and jostling; rubbing elbows with spruce clerks, brisk reporters, star-ing tourists and country copies. Discent with spruce clerks, brisk reporters, staring tourists and country cousins, absent minded bridal couples, and the sure footed lobbyist, darting inther and thither, or lying in a coil, kiding his time and chance. There was a great din and a grand rash of life, but no pomp, no fuss, no red tage. Your inoment came, your question was answered, your business transacted; and then the next man had a chance. It was democracy —the government of convenience—in action. Windward liked it, and somehow felt himself part of fine machine; for did he not propose and might he not procure legislation? Of course he rouldn't vote on measures, but only lunaities hold votes and power to be synonymous. Influence he did have or at least saw fluence he did have or at least saw how he might acquire it, and ballots are to influence as money is to value—its Little by little his acquaintance enlarged. Congressmen modded to him and he exchanged pleasant words here and there with clerks, employes and hangers on. One day he fell into the hahds of a newspaper correspondent, and was "interviewed" almost before he knew it.

After that experience for a few days the newspapers had a new interest for him. The interview itself: was well fnough done. It was written carelessly

Windward took a file of these clip-pings and others like them to the colo-ne's house one evening, and showed them to him and Louise with not a little trepidation, for he had been disobeying orders, and this was the consequence. The colonel read the extracts in his

Louise smiled, but looked up inquiringly, as if to insist on more explicit flattery. Nor did she fail to gain an explanation, for interpreting the desired of the second of the secon a kind word is generally sufficient—my-taing but money; only fools try to buy men for cash."

"I did speak to Senator Bills about Mr. Bassett's claim," said Louise, "and be seemed much interested."
"No doubt," observed the colonel. You are more interesting. Louise, than an editorial."

McArdle then questioned Windward as to his personal labors with congressmen, and was good enough to compliment him on the progress he had made. "I think you are really doing well," he said, "so well, in fact, that you are in danger of becoming absorbed. Remember your uncle's advice to be moderate and has some you give yourself recreate, and be sure you give yourself recreation—walks, books, theatres and the

"Indeed?" exclaimed Windward. It had been already his third offense in that line, and he had tickets in his pocket that line, and he had tickets in an pocket for a fourth; so, of course, heavas grati-fied to learn that his efforts to please were successful. "I am glad she liked it," he said. "What an interesting girl

"Very," replied Louise.
"Very," echoed McArdle, and added: "She has a certain keep-your-distance alr that is very attractive. Her eyes say, 'Come at your peril, lust come!' Quite a dangerous type, Mr. Bassett!" The colonel spoke lightly, but his keen the coloner spote lightly, but his keen eyes were watching the young man closely, and he did not seem to like what he saw; for be went on cautiously, skillfully and remorselessly in his analysis: "She has what a modern, writer has well defined as 'temperamental affability,' a charming quality. Oh! she's a nice, pretty girl: hopuber, jolly—a regular skating rink, church fair, harge party, orchestra chair course had. skating rink, church fatt, harge party, orchestra chair young lady. I am very foul of her. I camremember her mother as a bello before i'er. Clara is just like her. She takes after her mother, and all the young fellows, take after her. How many offers did you say she has had this many offers did you say she has had this winter, Louise?"

"Why, three or four," she said, not "Why, three or four," she said, not quite prepared for such a question, and wondering a little at the colonel's line of conversation. Windward, for his part, did not relish or understand it at all, and yet there was nothing he could specifically object to or take offense st. Still he wished McArdle would change the subject: but the colone had no such insubject; but the colonel had no such in-snoper; but the colonel had no such intention.

"Three or four," he went on in his most placid and urbane manner. "I don't suppose she keeps a close count herself. One, more or less, doesn't matter. Yes, a bright, lively girl, and the hest gossip I know. I tell her she ought to write a book."

"She would give you a good character if she did," said Windward, thinking it was time to interfere. "She thinks a great deal of you." Possibly the young man designed to have this shaft carry a little rebuke with it; if so, the colonel showed no sign of being hit.

"Clara and I are good friends." And here he stopped, believing he had said enough. Louise, bending over her work, thought on her part that for once he had said too much.

Windward was nettled, but still more

Windward was nettled, but still more perplexed than annoyed. The colonel rarely gossiped, and never spoke idly or unadvisedly. Moreover, though tacitum or brusque, he was never rude, and Windward had reason to believe he was sincerely interested in him and wished to befriend him. Possibly it was accidental, an idle breath of lefsure and relaxation, but the colonel's pruises certainly disparaged the young lady who was beginning to eccupy more of his thoughts than he was wholly willing to admit to himself.

"The schonel doesn't like her, "except as a playifning, and he doesn's wish me to; that is evident," masset the young man on his way home the glady. "And Shovehs doesn't like her, Eccahahas had offers well, so has after she had direct well, so has after she had direct matter." For always, see a string of that matter. For always, see a string of

In let way." Sometimes the colonel's compliments did not praise.

It was not the sharp air alone that made Windward's ears burn that night, for not only the Maardle household, but the Willises, mother and daughter, were discussing him behird the back.

"Who is this Mr. Bassett, anyhow?" asked Mrs. Willis of her sprightly daughter.

He's a young man I met at the Me-Ardles," Clara replied.
"I don't know as that is any particular recommendation," said the matron"What's his business?"
"What's his business?"

"What's his business?"

"Oh, I believe he has a chaim," explained Clara, in much the tone one would use in explaining that an acquaintance had a cough or any other ilisagreeable chronic ailment.

"Well, if tont's all he sgot, I wouldn't let him get much of a claim on me!" said the predent mether.

said the prudent mother.

The trim little maiden looked modestly down, trifled with a bunch of rosebuds at her throat and smiled, showing her pretty dimple. "I guess Clara can take care of herself," thought the observant mother, and went upstairs to bed quite free from anxiety
